

WHERE PURPOSE MEETS PRACTICE: THE EDUCATIONAL VISION OF AKASH NAGPAL

There is a particular kind of institution that goes beyond conferring degrees — one that takes seriously its obligation to the community it inhabits, the students it shapes, and the society it ultimately serves. The Krupanidhi Group of Institutions (KGI) has, over the years, aspired to be precisely that kind of institution. At the centre of that aspiration is its Executive Chairman, Akash Nagpal — an educationalist, entrepreneur, investor and philanthropist whose approach to building institutions is guided by a belief that education, at its most powerful, is an engine for social transformation.

Akash Nagpal's work spans multiple domains — higher education, school education, healthcare, entrepreneurship and research — yet each initiative is connected by a common thread: the conviction that institutions must remain accountable not only to their enrolled students but to the wider world in which those students will eventually operate.

Foundations Forged Abroad

Akash Nagpal's outlook on education was shaped significantly by his postgraduate years at Monash University in Australia. Studying in an internationally competitive academic environment gave him a perspective that went well beyond curricula and examinations. He returned with a conviction that institutions must do more than transfer knowledge — they must produce graduates who think ethically, act with environmental consciousness and are willing to take personal ownership of the challenges unfolding around them.

That philosophy — that education carries a moral dimension, and that young people must be equipped to engage with it — became the foundation on which he would eventually build KGI and Asia Pacific World School. It was not simply an academic mission; it was, from the outset, a social one.

Building a Community of 10,000

Under Akash Nagpal's leadership, KGI has grown into a thriving academic ecosystem that today serves over 10,000 students from diverse geographical, cultural and academic backgrounds. This growth has not been incidental. It is the outcome of deliberate institutional choices — around curriculum design, faculty development, student support and infrastructure — that collectively reflect a commitment to
