STUDENTSPEAK

"TISS is inclusive and diverse. Fieldwork helped me engage with communities, understand social realities, think critically and seek practical solutions, regardless of age or background"

use of artificial intelligence. "There are benefits from AI in some areas, like forecasting projects, data visualisation, capacity-building of human resources, documentation and resource mobilisation," says Jojo. "What makes TISS unique is its blend of rigorous academic learning and immersive fieldwork, ensuring that theory is tested against ground realities," says Gopal Mitra, UNICEF's global lead on Disability and Development and a TISS alumnus. "TISS taught me to respect diverse perspectives and to question my own assumptions and biases. I continue to draw on these values and skills."

This year, TISS completes 90 years. In the pipeline are seminars, conferences with international experts, publications and a focus on areas such as youth, women and farmers. There is emphasis on multidisciplinary studies, ability- and skill-enhancement, and value-added courses in the undergraduate programme.

It is this variety that draws students such as Jagrit Yadav from New Delhi to TISS. "We write our reflections and learnings from fieldwork. It has made me more observant and helped me understand the whys." Yadav also appreciates that at TISS he gets to engage with master's and PhD scholars. This, combined with fieldwork and classroom learning, gives students a richer understanding of social realities and the skills needed to work with communities. ■
