ing initiatives that keep up with a changing legal profession.

Two new academic blocks will come up by the end of this year, according to Krishnaswamy, which are part of a phased overhaul targeted for completion in 2028. The expanded infrastructure, which will include new hostel buildings, will cater to nearly 3,000 students, a climb from the current headcount of 1,934 students on campus as of July 2026. Currently, 118 faculty members cater to these students.

NLSIU will soon launch a research centre dedicated to promoting equity, inclusion and justice in India's legal profession. Its first project, the Women's Inclusion and Leadership in Law (WILL) Initiative, will seek to highlight the structural barriers hindering women's participation in the profession

"NLSIU has had the privilege of being at the top of national rankings in legal education for some time. We understand that this is both a privilege and a responsibility, requiring us to maintain standards, set new benchmarks and grow at every stage"

PROF. DR SUDHIR KRISHNASWAMY
Vice Chancellor, NLSIU

"We are very excited to set a new benchmark not only for legal education but for what university education should aspire to be, in terms of open and inclusive spaces," says Krishnaswamy.

On the academic front, NLSIU plans to begin extensive pilots using AI tutoring models. "There is a great deal of experimentation across the world in this field. I am glad to say that we, at NLSIU, are at its cutting edge. We have adopted and implemented AI platforms as effectively as anyone," says Krishnaswamy. "This year, we are looking to embed the technology further into the university's teaching and learning practices. As we close out the calendar year, we hope to have adequate evidence to roll out much larger initiatives," he adds.

NLSIU will launch a new research centre this academic year, dedicated to promoting equity, inclusion and justice within India's legal profession. The centre's first project, the Women's Inclusion and Leadership in Law (WILL) Initiative, will seek to highlight the structural barriers hindering women's participation in the profession through evidence-based research.
