well. Faculty members are being encouraged to move away from lecture-heavy classrooms and adopt more interactive methods, using videos, graphics and discussions instead of relying solely on the blackboard. As Singh puts it, every lecture should feel like "an episode of a web series" that leaves students wanting to know more.

Artificial Intelligence is another area the university refuses to ignore. Singh sees AI not as a threat but as a tool with which students must learn to work. DU is seeking to prepare students for jobs that may not yet exist by focusing on AI literacy, entrepreneurship, critical thinking, financial literacy, innovation, problem-solving and adaptability.

Looking ahead, DU is also expanding physically. It is preparing to launch a new college from the next academic session, offering futuristic programmes in Computer Science, AI, Data Science and Entrepreneurship.

Another enduring strength is the university's exceptional alumni network, which spans politics, business, academia, the arts, media and the civil services. This network connects students to accomplished professionals across fields and reinforces the university's influence far beyond its campuses.

Whether that is enough to propel DU into the world's top 200 remains to be seen. What is already evident is that the university is seeking to redefine success through greater academic flexibility, stronger research and an education geared to a rapidly changing world. ■
