WHO'S WHO IN THE CJP

AJINKYA SHINDE, 35
National Organisation In-Charge

Formerly with AAP's youth wing, he is overall in-charge and executive head of the organisation. Responsible for CJP expansion

AAFREEN NAWAZ, 34
National Secretary

An MBA, she will lead the organisation secretariat, managing the central administration as well as operational logistics across teams

RATNA SINGH, 31
Lead, Legal Affairs

The Delhi-based lawyer will be building a nationwide network of volunteer lawyers to protect activist rights, provide legal aid to the cadre

ROHAN DESHPANDE, 31
Chief Technology Officer

Architect of the CJP's digital infrastructure, including membership portals, data security and digital mobilisation platforms

DEEPAK BALIYAN, 26
Co-charge

A farm issues activist, second in command in the sangathan; also north zone in-charge. Duties include CJP's expansion, cadre building

VIJAY MALLANGI, 30
Chief Media Coordinator

A Hyderabad-based activist, will oversee press relations, spokesperson management. Also in charge of south zone

VAISHNAVI GAUR, 29
Lead, Research & Policy

The public policy professional is responsible for research and public audits. Will lead the CJP's reform charters and vision documents

YOGESH INGLE, 33
Lead, Finance

Tasked with managing financial operations, budgeting, expenditure tracking and compliance frameworks. Also in charge of west zone

Note: Ankit Bharadwaj will be in charge of east and northeast zones. Over the next six months, CJP will establish state coordination committees as well as Lok Sabha constituency to city-level coordination units across India

Behind that deliberately understated image, however, the leadership is hardly accidental. The 30-year-old Dipke is not new to ringside politics. Before the Masters in Public Relations at Boston University, he had interned in AAP's social media team. Das was already an RTI activist at 18, and has also spent time in the trenches as a journalist. Ranka, the movement's 'policy brain', is a one-time volunteer for the AAP and also a former McKinsey consultant. None is a naïve stranger to political discourses. But beyond the three, it's still a group of random people who came together for a cause. Hence the structure and organisation now.

"It's a good start...they had to make an organisation structure," feels social media star/ political activist Meghnad, who has been part of the movement from the start and claims he introduced Dipke to Instagram. "But beyond that, there are things like goals, ideology... and how you go about in decision-making. That's very important. It will determine whether you are serious, or just trying to cosplay a political party."

MANY HANDS MAKE...

It's a critical time for the CJP, a two-month-old movement that has grown beyond the memes that first made it famous. The first time it called for supporters to go to Jantar Mantar, there were just about 800 people. Much of the eventual mobilisation was done by organisations that had been active on the ground even before, and they included the student wings of Left organisations such as the CPI(ML) Liberation and the All India Students' Association (AISA).

Indeed, even prior to Dipke's arrival from Boston, AISA had been protesting outside the education ministry on the exam leak issue. Neha Bora, its president, along with two other activists, were also on hunger strike with Sonam Wangchuk. One of her visitors at Jantar Mantar was the actress and activist Shabana Azmi, who even publicly kissed her hand with affection, an image that again went viral. The CJP's online following has been praised for its 'durability', but that owes a lot to these organised/ mobilised groups.