WORLD'S FIRST

For sure, The Chancery is London's most notable architectural masterpiece. It is a symbolic reinvention of the former US embassy into a public hospitality destination. The building's distinctive angular, original diagrid exterior rooftop is crowned with its iconic gilded eagle sculpture, crafted from aluminium by Theodore Roszak. The architectural restoration of the all-suite property includes eight restaurants and bars, and the expansive Asaya Spa.

Secondly, it takes celebration of art to another level, and is the worlds first hotel to have a knowledgable and articulate art concierge. Not only do I revel in a short art tour of its 830 pieces of art studded across the hotel but also come away with a deeper understanding of art. The whole gamut: emerging and established artists, contemporary and classical art too.

Moreover, this is also the first time that I experience this new era in luxury travel, with each stay including fully flexible check-in and check-out times. Many more "first-time evers" to their credit with restaurant Tobi Masa marking the London debut of one of the most celebrated influential Japanese Chef Masayoshi 'Masa' Takayama. Carbone, the first European outpost of the New York City cult favourite, too makes it's London debut. And the hotel's own Jacqueline, is a one of a kind tearoom and dessert salon rooted in seasonality, scent and sculptural precision.

Even their Advanced Wellness Asaya Spa introduces Taktouk, the first hotel clinic of its kind, renowned for it's advanced dermatological expertise with a holistic approach.

SENSE OF PLACE

It's the Rosewood hotel's focussed dedication to a "sense of place" that I enjoy the most. Across the world, I've experienced each city within the Rosewood hotel I've stayed in. From the meticulously picked artifacts, books and seemingly casual knick knacks in each suite to the bigger details. The Chancery straddles two worlds, not only does it pay homage to prominent American figures linked to the history of the building, but also to the UK with it's two sprawling penthouses: Charles House and Elizabeth House.

Along with the high-end haute Japanese it invests equal passion in Mayfair's neighbourhood delicatessen GSQ for coffee, freshly baked pastries, salads &
