

STYLE MEETS SOUND

Apple's flagship headphones are still among the most desirable in the business.

The AirPods Max 2 are the tech equivalent of a tailored designer jacket. There are cheaper alternatives. There are arguably more practical alternatives. But none quite scratch the same itch. Six years after the original model turned heads, Apple's luxury headphones return with smarter internals, stronger noise cancellation and the same unmistakable presence.

Design That Refuses to Age

Few headphones turn heads quite like the AirPods Max 2. The aluminium ear cups, mesh headband and immaculate finish still feel like they belong in a luxury boutique rather than an electronics store. Build quality is exceptional, with every hinge, button and adjustment carrying a reassuring sense of precision.

The catch? They are still heavy. At 386g, these headphones make their presence known from the moment they land on your head; saying that, comfort has improved over time.

Sound With a Silver Spoon

The AirPods Max 2 deliver a rich, energetic sound signature with deep, powerful bass and excellent noise cancellation. Voices are clear, movies sound cinematic and Spatial Audio remains one of the best implementations in the business.

Performance Beyond the Playlist

New H2 chip brings stronger active noise cancellation, seamless Apple ecosystem integration and outstanding microphone quality. Switching between Apple devices feels almost telepathic. Battery life, however, one can debate on; 20 to 22 hours are fine, but rivals often offer considerably more.

Verdict

A Luxury One Wants to Own

AirPods Max 2 are beautifully made (available in lot of trendy shades), wonderfully connected and impressively quiet. They are on the heavier side and occasionally overshadowed by Apple's own AirPods Pro. And yet, like a designer watch that tells the same time as every other watch, they possess an appeal that goes beyond pure practicality. Sensible? Almost. Desirable? Absolutely.
