

and violative of women's rights over their own bodies, while 29 per cent say Parliament, not the courts, should settle the matter. So the picture that emerges is of an institution in transition. Women are no longer willing to treat marriage as a zone where consent is presumed. That said, family remains the first court where their autonomy is tried, and only 54 per cent feel comfortable even discussing a violation with friends or family. The private sphere, it seems, is where India's consent revolution will be won or lost. ■

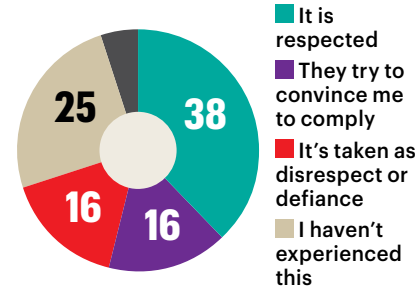

Q. In social gatherings like parties, weddings, family events, is a woman's refusal to participate (e.g., in dancing, drinking, hugging relatives) respected?

Q. Have you ever been pressured into physical contact like hugs, touching feet, sitting close, under the label of 'culture' or 'tradition'?

Q. If you say 'no' to a request from an elder or family member, for example, refusing a hug or declining to do something that makes you uncomfortable, how is your refusal typically received?

Rest, don't know/ can't say (DK/ CS); all figures in %