STORMING THE CAPITAL

For our first edition of the Electrifying India we flag off the drive from the India Today Mediaplex and go exploring Delhi's smorgasbord of palettes through its many niche flavours

To understand Delhi, you must accept it as a geographic palimpsest where successive empires have written over their predecessors. Navigating this structural identity crisis requires two things: a vehicle with an exceptionally compliant suspension, and a passenger seat occupied by Anubhav Sapra, the walking calorie encyclopedia behind Delhi Food Walks. Our culinary exploration began in the glorious, claustrophobic labyrinth of Shahjahanabad. In a conventional luxury car, these fluid human rivers would be a nightmare of engine heat and pedestrian guilt. Instead, the silent, zero-emission VinFast VF 7 acted as a rolling sensory vacuum, gliding detached through the Mughal chaos. Our first tactical stop was Vaishnav Chat Bhandar—a CM-approved masterclass in structural integrity, offering an explosive, rapid-fire chemical reaction of sweet, sour, and spiced pani-puri. From the dense Mughal core, we accelerated into the rigid colonial geometry of Connaught Place. To survive the afternoon heat, we sought out Brijwasi Sweets, an establishment operating on a level of dairy fanaticism I deeply respect. Their rasgulla and rasmalai, crafted from pure milk ferried daily from Mathura, possess a texture so light it reduces mass-produced confectionery to industrial sludge. Finally, we pushed north to Majnu ka Tilla, a vibrant Tibetan enclave where North Indian ghee gives way to steaming broth and fermented cheese. Here, a brilliant fusion of delicate momos and fiery ema datshi pizza perfectly mirrored how this cosmopolitan sponge expands by absorbing new cultures. Delhi is a magnificent, disjointed trilogy—and there is no better way to chart its shifting tectonic plates than using the silence of an EV to navigate the spaces between.

Auto Today's editorial team strikes a pose with VinFast India's leadership team and the VF 7 at the flag off of the Electrifying India Drive