exchange can flow effortlessly." Returning to Kochi, where he once exhibited, Attia describes the city as a harbour shaped by centuries of exchange. Human connections and influences, he insists, have blended in the town to create a multi-layered culture.

Known for collaborations across disciplines, Attia suggests that KMB 2027 will likely bring together psychoanalysis, psychiatry, history, architecture, craft, cinema, and cooking, while also emerging from conversations with local communities. "Upon arriving in Kochi, I could sense the imposed presence of European colonisers, but also how this part of Indian society has absorbed these influences and re-appropriated them from its own perspective. This is something I will keep in mind," he adds.

Migration, especially the Mediterranean as a tragic corridor, remains central to his thought. However, Attia insists that the tragedy has less to do with the sea than with "wild capitalism". Seeing art through the lens of poetry—as something that binds one to the cosmos—he cautions against a future in which desire is increasingly bypassed by digital automation. "We must invest much more in verse before it becomes artificially predictable," he says.

Attia has been suspicious of beauty when it anaesthetises violence, and believes that artists serve as bridges between visible and invisible worlds. "That is the reason art has always been a sacred space-time." ■

—Sukant Deepak

DOUBLE DIGITS Artists Jiten Thukral (left) and Sumir Tagra; far left, 'Shadow Mimesis-4'

are stretched across online and offline realms, our experience today is being archived, measured and reshaped in algorithmic rituals. In this evolving digital condition, this exhibition asks what it means to inhabit worlds built through data and mediated images," share the duo. Through hundreds of canvases depicting imagined data structures, this work grounds the fleeting abstraction of the digital world in the slow, physical weight of paint. ■

—Deepali Dhingra

The exhibition is on view till Jul. 17 at Ashvita's Flagship, Mylapore, Chennai

ART ▶

Collective Effort

A GROUP EXHIBITION AT TARQ, MUMBAI CELEBRATES ARTISTIC PRACTICES THAT GROW THROUGH ACCUMULATION RATHER THAN SPECTACLE

SHARED VISIONS Left, 'OD B MERICA' by Tim Davis; below, 'Untitled' by Sharon Horvath

TARQ, Mumbai, presents Brick by Brac, a group exhibition conceived and organised by artists Tom Burckhardt and Sameer Kulavoor. Bringing together 10 artists from India and the United States, the exhibition explores artistic practices rooted in repetition, accumulation, process, and the gradual construction of meaning.

Featuring works by Amy Sillman, Matthew Northridge, Sameer Kulavoor, Sharon Horvath, Shruti Mahajan, Sunil Padwal, Tim Davis, Tom Burckhardt, T. Venkanna and Vishwa Shroff, the exhibition takes inspiration from the act of building.

Working across drawing, collage, photography, film and mixed media, the artists embrace a mode of making that values discovery over certainty. The exhibition highlights the value of patience and persistence, celebrating practices that grow through accumulation rather than spectacle.

For Hena Kapadia, founder of TARQ, the exhibition aligns closely with the gallery's ethos. "The spirit of Brick by Brac echoes the collaboration and camaraderie that have been central to TARQ over the years," she says. Kapadia adds that the exhibition reflects the type of practice the gallery has long championed: "A commitment to building a practice piece by piece, meticulously, has always been a pillar of the artists we show at TARQ." ■

—Nikhil Sardana

The exhibition runs at TARQ, Mumbai, till Jul. 4