Hublot

Big Bang Reloaded

Hublot does not do little revisions. The 44 mm Big Bang Reloaded sharpens its case and foregrounds the Unico flyback, complete with a dial-side column wheel where it belongs, visibly working. Five core executions span titanium, ceramic and Magic Gold; athlete editions add extra decibels. The date moves, the counter improves and two quick-change straps come standard. Still large, still loud, but crucially more coherent. Restraint would have been dishonest.

NAKED VELOCITY

Zenith

Chronomaster Sport Skeleton

Zenith makes the Daytona comparison transparent with the Chronomaster Sport Skeleton. The 5 Hz El Primero 3600SK sits beneath a smoky sapphire dial, exposing its blue column wheel, clutch and architecture while the central hand laps the dial every ten seconds. Four 41 mm versions span steel, rose gold and diamonds; the black-bezel steel model is the grown-up choice. A new micro-adjustable Zenclasp fixes an annoyance. Busy? Certainly. But few skeleton watches deliver this much speed without turning legibility into roadkill.
