

The contrast isn't lost on me.

Just minutes from Terminal 2, I arrive at the new Roswyn, the first property from Ennismore's Morgans Originals portfolio to open in India and one of Accor's most design-forward hotels in the country. Walking in feels less like entering a hotel and more like stepping into the home of a well-travelled friend. Shelves lined with books and curios, artefacts tucked into corners, and artworks that reveal themselves gradually. A monumental fireplace anchors the lobby—an unexpected sight in tropical Mumbai—while carved wooden works are a nod to the city's Art Deco heritage. Delicate flowers preserved in resin catch the light along one wall, softening the visual richness.

Roswyn's maximalist personality reveals itself layer by layer. The corridors feature artworks that invite a second glance: photographic diptychs of Mumbai beaches capturing rare moments of stillness, alongside traditional embroideries, ceramic works and playful mixed-media pieces. At a time when so many luxury hotels seem determined to outdo one another in shades of pastel, Roswyn embraces the opposite. Parisian designer Daphné Desjeux has created a rich, theatrical world of burgundy and teal hues, mirrored hallways, striking lighting and bold, sculptural furniture. The effect is heightened by an art programme curated by Venu Juneja, where every piece feels thoughtfully placed rather than merely displayed. There are prints on prints on prints, and enough visual detail to keep your eyes wandering long after check-in.

"Today, true luxury is no longer about immediate shock and awe or ostentatious statements," says Desjeux. "For us, true luxury is the feeling of being entirely at home in a foreign city, surrounded by objects chosen with deep intention." Rather than leaning on familiar visual shorthand—the sea, colonial nostalgia or Bollywood exuberance—she sought to capture Mumbai's "contrasts, layers, raw energy and overlapping rhythms." The result is what she describes as "a living, coherent story that unfolds step by step", rewarding those who take the time to notice the details.

Roswyn is an all-suite hotel, and in a city where space is perhaps the ultimate luxury, that immediately sets it apart. My suite feels less like a hotel room and more like a stylish pied-à-terre, complete with a separate living area, kitchenette and workspace. At 80 sqm, it's larger than many Mumbai apartments, dressed in the same riot of colours, prints and embroidered
