

Clockwise from far left: A monumental fireplace, curios and artefacts adorn the lobby at Roswyn; the all-suite hotel offers some of the most spacious stays in Mumbai; the elegant bathrooms in the suites; the Roswyn Suite furnishings that define the rest of the hotel. The fully equipped kitchenette comes with everything from a Nespresso machine to an induction cooktop, though my favourite touch is the kokum-and-lime cocktail setup waiting on the island counter. Following the instructions, I mix myself a drink and sink into the sofa.

What surprises me most is how little I feel the need to step out. Mornings begin with coffee and a few hours of work at The Third Room, a stylish hybrid of a members' club and co-working lounge. Lunch is unhurried at the acclaimed Italian restaurant Fi'lia, whose Dubai outpost earned a Michelin star, with pillowy Neapolitan pizzas, handmade pastas and perfectly grilled jumbo prawns. Evenings end at Black Lacquer, the hotel's listening bar, where vinyl records set the mood and Nikkei-inspired food and cocktails arrive with quiet precision. In between, I slip away to Blu Xone, where a few minutes in the cryotherapy chamber wakes up every cell in my body, while red light therapy helps ease lingering inflammation and coaxes some life back into my travel-weary skin. By the end of my stay, I realise something unusual has happened: for perhaps the first time in Mumbai, I'm not counting down the hours until I can leave. Instead, I'm looking for reasons to stay a little longer.
