

From left, Nonna Mei's kitchen, chef Ahmedaki Laloo, the signature caprese salad and Diavolo pan dough pizza

turmeric Negronis. "The highlight for me was their mutton brain with jyllang and axone (fermented soybean). It's a take on the Italian dish, Trippa alla Romana, and is one of the yummiest things I have eaten," says chef and entrepreneur Ahmedaki Laloo. Situated just off Khyndailad right at the centre of buzzy Police Bazaar, the first-floor restaurant's expansive floor-to-ceiling windows make it a great spot for people-watching. They also have a quaint little store selling local fruit wines, pickles and preserves along with hand-painted cutlery and hand-embroidered napkins.

Address: The Shillong Address, Khyndailad, Police Bazaar

The Wok

Ask any local and they'd tell you that Shillong Chinese is different (and maybe even better) than the Indo-Chinese that's served in the rest of the country. Chow (noodles) and momo haven't just become culinary staples—you're not a true-blue Shillongite if you don't have a strong opinion on who does it best. In a city dotted with legacy Chinese restaurants, The Wok is an institution. Nothing about the 25-year-old restaurant is flashy; the interiors are basic and the food wholesome. "There's a sincerity in their flavours that hasn't changed in all these years. Their chow and chicken chilli are the hero and heroine of my meals there. On a cold, rainy day, their soup chow or even wonton soup hits the spot," says National Award-winning filmmaker Pradip Kurbah. The extensive menu now also features pan-Asian dishes like Vietnamese Pho and Thai curries.

Address: Laitumkhrah & LaChaumiere

Clockwise from left, filmmaker Pradip Kurbah, wontons, rice with chicken and pork, and The Wok interiors

