"I EAT, DRINK, SLEEP AND BREATHE ARCHITECTURE"

She leads a 250-person architecture firm, works on some of India's biggest real estate projects, and can still spend an afternoon worrying about a marble floor joint. For Vineeta Singhania, architecture isn't a profession. It's a way of seeing the world

By SHELLY ANAND

Photograph by AVESH GAUR

Walk into Vineeta Singhania's studio office in Delhi and something strikes you that doesn't always happen in beautifully designed interiors. The space feels calm and you relax, settling into your chair without even realising it. There's warmth that no mood board can produce; sunlight filters softly through rooms, greens feel genuinely alive, and nothing shouts for attention. Everything seems in place, quietly.

It's only after you've been sitting for an hour or two that you realise the space has been influencing your mood all along. "That's my personality in design," says Singhania with a smile. "That's who I am." For Singhania, founder partner and principal architect, Confluence, an architecture and interiors practice she set up in 1999 with a few friends, there is no separation between the person and the work. Nearly three decades after founding Confluence, she still speaks about design with the enthusiasm of someone discovering it for the first time.

A 250-person architecture firm now, Confluence is behind some of the country's most ambitious, talked-about large-scale projects including the ultra-luxurious high rise Adani