

LIVE IN STYLE
The living room (left) and the dining room (right) stand out for their all white decor and sleek look

When Radio Jockey Raunac Shankar and his wife, Sonam, approached my firm, Point Plus Designs, their brief was a fascinating contradiction to his public life. As one of India's most recognisable voices, Raunac's days are a high-decibel blur of energy, humour and non-stop conversation. For their 4,700 sq ft home, they wanted the exact antithesis: absolute stillness. They envisioned a sanctuary engineered for a slower pace, uncluttered, emotionally grounding and entirely free from visual noise.

The White Canvas

The main architectural challenge we faced was maintaining an all-white palette across furniture, walls and finishes. Without careful curation, white can quickly feel clinical, lifeless or flat. To combat this, my team and I introduced subtle layers and material nuances to give the space depth. Instead of flat paint, we utilised micro-concrete and lime-based finishes. These artisanal textures give the walls a fine grain that catches the light, creating a gentle play of shadow. We then injected warmth into the white canvas using light wood veneers and intricate cane detailing. Drawing heavily from Japandi sensibilities, we prioritised tactile materials, soft curves, and low-profile furniture that allows the eye to move through the volumes without interruption.
