While the loudest statement in high-end living is often the most restrained, the busiest roads demand the boldest gestures. On Mission Road in Bangalore, where traffic pulses relentlessly, an 18,000 sq ft structure punctures the urban fabric with a peculiar kind of restraint—minimalist luxury wearing a proud geometric crown. Designed by Oak Atelier, this is Maia Hhome, a new luxe venture by an established wholesale operation pivoting toward retail.

"The facade had to be inviting," recalls Karan Pirgal of the brief, who conceived this project alongside his father Prakash Pirgal and associate director M Murli. Five levels rise in response, each dedicated to a distinct brand within the Maia ecosystem—Eternal Linen, Opulent Aromas, Skin Secrets and Pristine Ware—with the ground floor introducing all four simultaneously. A steel structure clad in Ferro cement and ACP panels in two calibrated shades of grey gives the building its exterior character; apertures of varying shapes garb its surface, each casting a different quality of light within.

Products take Centre Stage

Inside, the orchestration deepens. "The products are the heroes," notes Karan "The space is their stage." Swathed in white, the ground level makes good on that principle immediately, highlighted by a reception counter fabricated from 21 handmade triangles fixed at differing angles to produce a surface that dances with light. All of it is deliberately colourless so that the products hold the room's reins entirely to themselves. Gold, the client's one persistent indulgence, threads through every storey in accents and fixtures.

Geometry of Vertical Space

But each ascending floor speaks a different geometric dialect. "Every space had to feel like its own world," explains Karan. "But all of them had to feel like they belonged to the same family." The first storey unfolds in clean linear narratives: a live mock-up bed anchors the space, dressed in the very covers and spreads on offer, displayed in situ rather than merely stacked. Walls shift through tones of grey for tactile depth. Refusing the tyranny of the right angle, the second level embraces triangles, its display niches cut in that form to accommodate the customised throws, carpets and pillows. The third storey belongs to hexagons, where premium decor is given the boldest display treatment of all, as its textured walls impart a material warmth the lower levels deliberately withhold. Custom-made ceiling tracks follow each floor's governing shape, to translate the lighting infrastructure into an expression of the level's spatial identity.

Vision meets Creative Freedom

"The client knew exactly what he wanted", says Karan, adding, "It gave us the freedom to figure out how." At Maia Hhome, that synergy, clarity of vision on one side, creative latitude on the other, results in a space extraordinary enough to draw you in, and wise enough to then step back.

Mehar Deep Kaur is a design writer specialising in research-led and editorial-grade narratives @mehardeep_official (Instagram)