

CHILD'S PLAY
(clockwise from right) WonderSlide Bunk Bed by Boingg; open storage; grow pegboards; low and sturdy kids toy shelf, all from LILA

Calm Does Not Mean Boring
A serene room isn't about clinical beige, but reducing visual noise to offer, as Boingg (a custom children furniture brand) founder Dhruvan Barar notes, there should be room to build, imagine, play and simply move around freely. "Parents today are consciously investing in spaces that enable positive habits rather than simply filling a room with furniture," says Barar, who is seeing a rise in accessible bookshelves, child-height storage and furniture that children can use independently.

Functional Longevity
Instead of replacing age-specific furniture, investing in adaptable, multi-functional pieces allows rooms to evolve. Child psychologist, co-founder and CEO of Petals Preschool and Daycare, Preeti Kwatra highlights that this approach gives children a sense of continuity and security while fostering independence, as they can navigate their environment without constant assistance. "When furniture adjusts to a child rather than the other way around, it also gives them a sense of independence early on; they can reach things, sit properly and use their space without constantly needing help," says Kwatra.

Curated Personalisation
The calmer-room trend does not mean taking personality out of the space. Instead of committing to a cartoon theme that may be outgrown quickly, Musvee suggests allowing personality to come through in the details. "Books, artwork, favourite objects, photographs and things they have made themselves can easily evolve as their interests change."

Globally, children's interiors are moving towards softer, nature-inspired palettes such as sage and olive green, dusty blue, butter yellow, muted lilac and warm terracotta, often balanced with warm neutrals and natural-looking finishes. The idea is to bring colour in without making every element compete for attention. Perhaps this is where parents need to step back from the perfect-room pressure. After all, child's room becomes special when the child sees something of themselves in it.