New Susegad Chic

How Bent Chair's new flagship villa in Goa trades high-octane urban quirk for a blueprint in easy, tropical resort living

By Ridhi Kale

There was a time when a walk through a Bent Chair showroom felt like an intentional jolt to the system. Ten years ago, the brand burst onto the Indian design landscape with an unapologetic mandate; loud colours, whimsical silhouettes and a fierce commitment to quirk that dared the consumer to step out of their comfort zone. Now, celebrating a milestone tenth anniversary, founder Natasha Jain is ready to slow things down. The brand's latest outpost isn't just a new pin on the map; it is a fundamental shift in DNA. Housed inside a sprawling, 100-year-old traditional Goan villa, the new flagship completely sheds everything you previously knew about the brand. Instead, it leans gracefully into susegad, the quintessential coastal philosophy of relaxed, unhurried living.

House of Wonder

Finding the right home for this evolutionary step took time. It took six months of meticulous restoration to convert the centenarian structure into a liveable retail space, taking care never to disturb the original roofline, the flow of the rooms or the basic historic elements of the property. Stepping across the threshold feels less like walking into the well-appointed home of an eccentric, well-travelled friend. For Jain, the architectural envelope was non-negotiable. "Every store we've done before has had that very city vibe to it, a concrete kind of experience," notes Jain. "We never really thought about doing a furniture store inside a house, but now that we've done this, you actually
