

ACE OF SPACE

warm brass accents, antique chandeliers, vintage rugs and heirloom objects that create spaces that feel layered rather than decorated. Every object contributes to a narrative, reflecting their belief that good design is built over time, not assembled all at once. The bungalow ultimately feels more like a home than a workplace because they believe the most memorable spaces are the ones that make people feel something. In many ways, the bungalow mirrors Alloy itself; just as the structure carries the weight of its history, Alloy is built on decades of independent practice, experience, and craftsmanship.

As Alloy grows, their ambition is not simply to design and build more spaces within their core verticals, but to broaden what a design practice can contribute and be. Every project begins with understanding its culture, climate, context and, above all, the people it is being created for, because enduring design comes from responding thoughtfully to these forces rather than following trends or formulas. Looking ahead, they want to continue creating work that is rooted in authenticity while pushing the boundaries of what design can be by embracing new ideas, meaningful collaborations and conversations that add value both within and beyond the design industry. For Alloy, success is not measured by the number of projects they complete, but by the impact they leave behind and the way they enrich the lives of the people who experience them.
