

and architectural intervention sought to enhance its timeless Victorian hill character. We curated a design language defined by classic colonial palettes, handcrafted furniture, antique chandeliers and intricate bay window details that resonate with the elegance of its past. The exterior elevation was approached with equal sensitivity; warm wooden facades, restored dormer windows, wooden columns and graceful arches recreate a classic colonial identity rooted deeply within its mountainous context.

Connecting Architecture and Landscape

The redesign completely redefined the relationship between the built form and the surrounding environment. Ground-floor rooms, which were originally connected through dark internal corridors, were transformed into independent cottage-style suites. Each suite now features its own private sit-out and independent entrance overlooking the valley, establishing an intimate, immersive mountain living experience for guests.

To bring the outdoors inside, we thoughtfully introduced dormer windows and skylights into previously dark spaces. This allowed natural light to filter deep into the interiors while perfectly framing uninterrupted views of the majestic Dhauladhar ranges. More than just a restored resort, Terrah Hills has become a living story where history, craftsmanship, light, and landscape exist in quiet harmony.
