Giving the Home a Pulse

The spatial narrative unfolds immediately at the entrance, where a bold, sculptural staircase acts as the home's defining visual anchor. Rising through a double-height volume, it draws the eye upward and introduces an intense warmth against an otherwise cool backdrop of concrete panels, marble, and glass. The colour choice was highly intentional, not a bright scarlet, but a deep crimson that carries weight and richness. More than a circulation element, it shapes the emotional atmosphere. A connecting passage bridges the upper level above it, while a large art installation stretches from the staircase toward the living room, seamlessly tying the home together.

Built for Fluid Living

The lower level is dedicated to shared family life, engineered to avoid rigid, claustrophobic separations. A lounge featuring a concealed entertainment unit and bar area transitions effortlessly into the double-height living room, which then flows into the dining space and dry kitchen. To keep the visual lines clean, the utility zone and wet kitchen are tucked away discreetly into one corner of the floor, balanced by a comfortable guest bedroom in the opposite wing.

Quiet Rhythm

Moving upstairs, the first floor transitions into a quieter, highly private rhythm. The connecting passage overlooking the grand living volume leads to the three primary suites. We intentionally dedicated one entire side of the floor to the younger daughter, complete with her own private balcony, walk-in wardrobe, and bath. The master suite sits on the opposite end, balanced by the elder daughter's bedroom.

Throughout the residence, the planning consistently prioritises openness over excess built space. Instead of maximising every square foot available, the layout was intentionally kept breathable, allowing natural light and ventilation to become defining elements of the home. The result feels closer to a sky villa than a conventional apartment, shaped around a way of living that values connection over compartmentalisation.

The moment the crimson glass was installed, the entire house exhaled. We had designed a quiet, monastic envelope, but it was that deep crimson that gave it a soul. Standing at the entrance at dusk, the uplights hit the glass and the whole staircase glows like it is breathing. That is when you realise: the architecture had good bones, but crimson gave it blood. It is not just a focal point; it is the reason you remember the home.
