PART OF A SOLO EXHIBITION, NAEEM MOHA
THE VANISHED LEGACY OF BANGLADESHI

At 36, novelist–filmmaker Zahir Raihan set out looking for his brother, who had been captured by the Pakistani army prior to Bangladesh's formation. Shortly after the Bangladesh liberation war of 1971, the Stop Genocide (1971) director vanished during this search (his brother was never found either). When artist–filmmaker Naeem Mohaiemen was informed that Raihan had been working on a third film during this time, he got curious.

Mohaiemen seeks to find out about that film in his 44-minute cinematic essay, A Missing Can of Film, which is having its Kolkata premiere at Experimenter as part of Mohaiemen's solo exhibition, Raihan–Ghatak–Tarkovsky. Mohaiemen punches clips from Raihan's prolific work, including Urdu and Bengali melodramas as well as political documentaries, and juxtaposes these with visuals of the deserted Bangladesh Film Development Corporation (BFDC) complex following the students' uprising in 2024.

Mohaiemen's project is to investigate histories that go missing while recording official history. A scene in the film argues that a photo of an angry Ritwik Ghatak, instead of a photo of Satyajit Ray, may have suited the BFDC premises,
