The stackable omni pot works on induction and is designed to be portable

For students living away from home, frequent campers or corporate professionals living out of suitcases, maintaining a healthy, home-cooked routine is always a challenge. Electric multi-cookers offer a solution, but most are bulky and tough to clean. Addressing this gap, kitchenware giant TTK Prestige has introduced the newly launched Prestige Omni Pot, a compact, ultra-portable cooking system that brings heavy duty utility into an incredibly packable form factor.

Thoughtful, Modular Design

Unlike standard integrated electric kettles or cookers, the Omni Pot features a clever, modular two-piece setup. It consists of a standalone 1,000-watt heating base and separate cooking vessels. The base unit is crafted with a robust, off-white and black plastic body, sporting rubberised feet to prevent slipping on cramped countertops.

The star feature for travellers is the inclusion of a 1.3-litre cooking pot and a frying pan, both built from lightweight aluminium and coated with a slick non-stick interior. Both vessels feature heavy-duty, fold-away stainless steel handles that clip flat against the sides. This thoughtful engineering means the entire set nests together neatly into a backpack. Cleaning is equally simple; since the heating base stays completely separate, you can scrub the cooking pots under running water like standard dishes without risking electrical damage.

Small Footprint, Big Performance

Despite its compact 20 × 20 × 22cm base, this gadget punches well above its weight. Operation is entirely manual via a mechanical slider switch featuring low, medium and high temperature zones. In real-world testing, it proves highly versatile. The frying pan distributes heat evenly enough to flip flawless, perfectly round omelettes. For heavier meals, the 1.3-litre deep pot can easily simmer up to half a kilo of chicken curry or cook 300g of rice. A rich chicken dish takes roughly 45 to 50 minutes to cook fully from scratch. The appliance also utilises an intelligent built-in auto-cut mechanism that dynamically pauses heating to prevent dry-burning or over-boiling.

Priced comfortably at ₹5,325, it is a practical investment for anyone looking for hot meals on the go.
