ing Beze dam is one such project that serves as both a weekend home for the owner's family and a rental villa for those looking to unwind peacefully, away from the city noise. Once you park your car, you are guided into the residence by a stone pathway lined with native plants on either side, facilitating the transition from city life chaos to tranquillity. The stone goes on to envelop the entrance foyer of the residence. The plan is linear, maximising views of the backwaters for as many spaces as possible. "Because we wanted all the bedrooms to face the pristine backwaters, inevitably we had longer corridors. When one walks these corridors, they can seem daunting and sometimes even boring. So we inserted a series of courtyards along the corridors that connect diagonally to each other. Every time you are walking, either to your right or to your left, you will always have a courtyard. This ensures that you will be able to experience the nature you came to experience here, across all seasons," share the architects.

But what if you're living in an urban jungle? What if you don't have the luxury of being nestled in pristine natural landscapes? Architect Rohan Chavan, the founder of RC Architects, a multidisciplinary design practice with offices in Bangalore and Mumbai, has designed multiple homes in both contexts. "When we
