in ways traditional universities can't," he explains.

One such distinctive feature is the college's focus on real-world training—a gap that Manohar Thairani, president of the college, aimed to bridge when he founded it in 2003. "As a chartered accountant, there was no one to guide me on niche areas I could focus on during my articleship or the skills truly needed in the real world," Thairani shares. Now, 20-25 per cent of the faculty comprises practising professionals, former judges and lawyers. This industry-integrated approach benefits students in concrete ways. "For instance, if a faculty member is a judge, students gain a realistic perspective; they understand not just the prestige of judgeship, but also its limitations and the skills required to navigate it," he explains. From among the 300-350 PCS (Provincial Civil Service) judges appointed last year, 11 were Lloyd alumni. "It was a proud moment for us," he adds.

To take practical learning even further, the college has developed a platform called EdNectar—a simulated criminal law training software that helps students apply classroom theory in a virtual, real-world setting. Through this, students learn how to file complaints, draft charge sheets, write bail applications etc. The software is currently in its pilot phase.

It's no surprise then that Lloyd students spend nearly 50 per cent of their time interning, says Prof. Mohd Salim, senior director & dean. "In their first year itself, students do mandatory two-month internships during both summer and winter breaks, and one option month during the academic session. In the final year, they undergo a six-month internship, with classes held on weekends, evenings or online," he adds. This emphasis on practical training is reflected in outcomes. "Today, nearly 30 per cent of our students are absorbed by tier-I law firms," says Dr Akhilesh Kumar Khan, director. "Employers now want graduates who are job-ready, not just eager to learn." Their average placement package has risen from Rs 8.5 lakh in 2020 to Rs 12.5 lakh in 2025.

All this training is put to the test in moot court competitions, where students argue hypothetical legal cases. This year alone, Lloyd students participated in 80 domestic and 15 international competitions. ■
