REHAN KHAN

was part of the first graduating batch in 1982. Recently, it also became the first government institute in Maharashtra to offer a PG course in Public Health Dentistry. "We're admitting three students in this new programme," says Dr Indurkar. "This is crucial, considering the need for community-level preventive oral healthcare, especially in rural India."

Beyond academics, the college nurtures student life with indoor and outdoor gyms, sports infrastructure and wellness initiatives that promote mental health and community engagement. From a modest start, GDCH has emerged as a model for what publicly funded healthcare education can achieve—when backed by both investment and intent. ■
