securitisation to raise capital means that more 'financially excluded' people, who in Western terms could be designated as sub-prime borrowers, are brought into the market. ABS in the Global South is quite small in comparison to US markets. Nonetheless, the use of ABS in a wide variety of financial inclusion initiatives has been growing rapidly, albeit unevenly, since the late 1990s.

Yet it is important to grasp that, despite its technical and thus seemingly neutral language, securitisation is neither an apolitical nor a win-win scenario for creditors and debtors alike, but instead is characterised by unequal and exploitative (i.e. predatory lending) relations of power. While securitisation may raise cheap capital for originators (e.g. MFIs) and serve to reduce financial risk for foreign investors engaging in ABS transactions in the Global South, it does so at a social cost by transferring both risks and extractive levies onto the poor.

ABS has done little to deliver on the neoliberal promise of growth and progress through investments in production and thus the creation of stable and sustainable wages and, by extension, poverty reduction. Indeed, the increased frequency and intensity of financial debacles has made the South, and especially the poor therein, more susceptible to the aftershocks of speculative-led accumulation.

Notwithstanding the historical experience of neoliberalism since the 1980s, the solution to the latest crisis has been to include more poor people into a volatile, speculative, and highly interconnected financial system, so that they may, in the words of the G20, 'manage their low, irregular and unreliable income'.

This is a class-based strategy to continually search for more outlets for speculative credit money by creating debtors linked to the global casino and it cannot possibly replace a social wage, decent and affordable housing, education and health services. The 'financial' should be rejected as a means and end-goal of being socially included.
