

"When it comes to making decisions, we do that collectively after thorough discussions with every stakeholder and managers. No one takes a decision single-handedly," confirms Saravdeep

Success, however, is not what the Lallys lead with. Their conversations always circle back to a single theme: people. People who trusted them. People who work with the. People who returned. People who became part of their story.

The same ethos applies to their staff. Every staff member, from entry level to top management, is recognised as central to operations. And this has nurtured a workplace where loyalty flows both ways.

Those emotions are grounded in real-world integrity. Even through downturns like demonetisation, regulatory shifts, the pandemic, the Lallys made sure that not a single employee salary was delayed. In the automotive trade, where churn is high and pay is variable, this is remarkable.

Awards and recognitions from Honda, Kia and Volkswagen have followed for volumes, service standards and customer satisfaction reaffirming that Lally Motors is not merely growing, but leading with quality.

Both the sons work on the values that Tarsem has passed down to them: Honesty, Passion, Financial Planning, Earning Goodwill & Respect, and Hard Work. "These are not framed on the wall, they are embedded in decisions," he says.

Lally Motors is not just expanding horizontally across geography; it is rising vertically in sophistication.
