BUILDING TRIDENT, SHAPING INDIA
THE RAJINDER GUPTA STORY

Rajinder Gupta is Chairman of Trident Group and a Rajya Sabha MP from Punjab. But in a world where success often announces itself, his presence speaks differently. It arrives not with fanfare, but with the quiet confidence of someone who has built an empire from conviction alone.

There is a particular quality to people who have created something enduring. Not inherited wealth or positional authority, but enterprises built from imagination and purpose. Rajinder Gupta embodies this rare combination. Yet what strikes you first about him is not the scale of what he has achieved, but the humility with which he carries it. There is an ease about him, the kind that belongs to people who have nothing left to prove because the work, across four decades and 150 countries, has already spoken for itself.

Under his leadership, Trident Group has grown to become a major global conglomerate. He is widely regarded as one of India's most respected industrialists, a distinction earned through decades of principled leadership. Now, as a member of the Rajya Sabha representing Punjab, he operates in the corridors of national policy. He describes his new role not as a reinvention but as a continuation of his lifelong commitment to society:

I have never bracketed myself as an industrialist or a politician. None of these labels define me. Becoming an MP is an opportunity to serve Punjab, especially Malwa, using the experience of 40 years. It is not about influence; it is about offering experience and perspective and hoping it contributes to the larger good."

Drawing from years spent with leaders, economists, thinkers, and workers at every level, he believes the best policy emerges not from theory but from reality. He describes his role not as wielding influence but as placing perspective where it might matter - at the right level, at the right moment, for the larger good.

The Boy from Bathinda Who Never Stopped Imagining

Rajinder Gupta's story has been called a small-town rise, but he frames it differently: a journey shaped by imagination. He grew up in Bathinda, the son of Nohar Chand Gupta and Maya Devi, in a family where values weren't discussed—they were lived. His mother, hardworking and unshakeable, instilled something fundamental: dignity comes from what you do, not what you have. Today, those values have been passed forward. His wife Madhu, son Abhishek, and daughter Neha are part of a family that remains grounded in the same principles.

Even now, at 66, comfort bores him. Rest feels irrelevant. "Non-working is boring. Work itself is the unwind. It has gone into the blood and bones. For me, work is a passion and an addiction," he says.
Even as chairman emeritus, Gupta's role has evolved from operator to advisor. "In terms of my

Trident's Manufacturing Powerhouses

Barnala, Punjab – The Legacy Core: An integrated hub for yarn, bath linen, wheat-straw paper and chemicals – the backbone of Trident's sustainable manufacturing.

Budhni, Madhya Pradesh – The Global Scale Engine: : One of the world's largest terry towel complexes, with production of bed linen, bath linen, yarn and energy has a strong export footprint across North America, Europe, the Middle East, Africa, and beyond.