Donald Trump is known to bet big, but the unfolding conflict in the Middle East, which saw the combined might of the American and Israeli armed forces rain down on Iran, may prove to be the US president's most consequential geopolitical gamble. Their joint military strikes, which began on February 28, decapitated much of Iran's leadership, including the long-serving Supreme Leader Ayatollah Ali Khamenei. The intent was to cripple Iran's nuclear and missile capabilities and reshape the balance of power not only in Iran but also in the Middle East. But rather than capitulating, Iran has so far exhibited resilience and retaliated by launching missiles and drones on Israel as well as on US military bases and energy infrastructure across the Gulf in a bid to draw a wider arc of countries into the war.

Worse followed. Iran closed the Strait of Hormuz, the artery through which roughly a fifth of the world's oil passes, and targeted cargo ships, pulling vital global trade routes, major energy markets and the fragile balance of international security into the vortex of a war whose objectives and outcomes remain worryingly unclear. Especially for India, which relies heavily on the region for its energy supplies and receives 38 per cent of its $135 billion (Rs 12.5 lakh crore) in remittances from the nearly 10 million expatriates working in the Gulf.

The human toll, too, has been mounting. Already, the war has claimed over 1,000 Iranian lives—tragically, 165
