

The result is a curated sanctuary that serves as a launchpad for homegrown brands—specifically those that lack a physical retail presence in Delhi. In an era of mindless scrolling, she is making a case for the tactile. "No one truly buys décor online," she says with the wit of a seasoned marketer. "It's like jewellery. You have to see it, feel it, wear it. You need to know how it lives in a room," she shares.

The Theology of Gaps

The home is almost a living-breathing entity, with its own quirks, flow and design style. The heart of the house is perhaps the most unconventional mandir. Eschewing the predictable lotus motifs and polished marble, she has opted for slate, ceramic wall art from Dharamshala and a philosophy of 'perfect imperfection'.

"I reached out to these ceramic artists and told them I wanted their pieces for my mandir. They were shocked—their pieces were broken, incomplete," she laughs. "But that's the point. When I sit in a spiritual space, I surrender as I am. I am imperfect. Why should my sacred space pretend to be otherwise? The gaps in the art define us."
