

THE GREAT REORDERING
Power Shifts and the Next Global Order

BEYOND THE BIG CHURN

The ongoing conflict in West Asia is part of a wider geopolitical contest shaping a new global order. That was the larger point made by geopolitical consultant Adelle Nazarian at the India Today conclave. According to her, while wars rarely produce winners at a human level, they often accelerate strategic realignments between nations. She sees the current conflict as likely to deepen ties between the US and India, while also bringing Gulf Cooperation Council states closer to the West. At the same time, Iran's future is "up to the Iranian people to decide their destiny", she said. "I don't think that any kind of true, effective change can happen without having some kind of intervention."

The conflict comes at a time when global alignments are shifting and energy security is under strain, Nazarian argued. The emerging order, she said, could resemble a 'Cold War 2.0', shaped not only by military power but also by technological competition and strategic resources as countries shift attention from traditional oil dependence to rare earths. ■

ADELLE NAZARIAN, Geopolitical Consultant

Photograph by BANDEEP SINGH

"There is no one that benefits from war on a human level, but geopolitically, this is a tremendous challenge and a competition for the new global order

The emerging order could resemble Cold War 2.0, shaped not only by military power but also by technological competition and strategic resources

KEY TAKEAWAYS

- The current conflict will bring about a stronger US-India relationship
- The war could nudge Gulf countries closer to western strategic partnerships
- Any political transformation in Iran must ultimately be driven by the Iranian people themselves
- Energy security and control over strategic resources could be key factors in shaping future alliances and conflicts