

MIRA KAPOOR ▲

Founder, Dhun Wellness; Co-founder, Akind Beauty

Today, we want a measurable marker of everything.... What we forget is to listen to what our body is telling us

It is about finding the right balance between wisdom and science and what suits you

SUNIEL SHETTY ▲

Actor & Fitness Icon

There is nothing called the celebrity diet. It's about quantifying your food. If you understand that, nothing else matters

Wellness is far, far cheaper than illness. So rather than fall ill, stay well all the time

▼ Advances in diagnostics are enabling earlier detection of disease risk, shifting the focus from curing illness to preventive healthcare

▼ Insights from Ayurveda about body constitution and lifestyle can work alongside modern diagnostics and genetic testing

▼ Health practices are increasingly being designed to fit into everyday routines, with shorter interventions that busy professionals can sustain arguing that wellness cannot remain confined to long retreats or elaborate programmes. Instead, she said, it must be built into daily routines—that "one hour that you're giving your body time to fix itself".

The medical perspective came from Dr Navin Dang, a veteran pathologist who placed the discussion within India's growing burden of lifestyle-related illnesses. For him, the most important shift in healthcare is the move from treating illness to preventing it. Advances in diagnostics are making earlier risk detection possible. New blood tests, he said, are being introduced that can flag susceptibility to several cancers long before symptoms appear.

But even the most advanced diagnostics cannot replace disciplined habits. "Ab zindagi lambi nahin, badi honi chahiye (life should not merely be long, but meaningful and of good quality)," he said, underscoring that wellness ultimately depends on how we live each day. ■