Women Who Move India

From ground operations to boardrooms, women are reshaping the male-dominated logistics sector. But breaking barriers will require more than changing perceptions; it will mean fixing the basic conditions that keep them out. BY MAMTA SHARMA

ILLUSTRATIONS BY NILANJAN DAS/AI

WHEN BHAIRAVI JANI, Executive Director, SCA Group of Companies, was interviewing a candidate for a CFO role, she expected the conversation to centre around the job. Instead, the candidate told her, "I think you should get married." Jani's response was immediate: "You are interviewing for the CFO role, not for the job of my husband."

This is not an uncommon experience for women in business. But in logistics, where operations and industry relationships have traditionally been dominated by men, a dramatic makeover is in the works. As e-commerce expands, technology reshapes operations, electric vehicles change fleets, and digital platforms make it easier to move goods across the country, women in the industry are becoming difficult to miss.

They are not just driving trucks or making deliveries. While some have been running family transport and logistics businesses for decades, others are taking charge of warehouses and supply chains, bringing technology into traditional enterprises and taking on P&L responsibilities.

One such woman is Jani, a fourth-generation entrepreneur and elder of the two daughters of Tushar Jani, a pioneer of India's express freight sector who co-founded Blue Dart Express and leads the SCA Group. Jani had the family