Q: You are investing an additional $ 5 billion in India. What is the plan?

A:. I am investing big time in Tuna Tekra (a deep-draft, all-weather satellite port terminal located in the Kutch district of Gujarat). I have just invested in Dadri, in an inland container depot. We will be putting our bids in for Vadhvan port. That in itself may be a $3-4 billion investment. But I don't know whether I am going to win the bid or not. These projects are all bid – there is no bilateral negotiation. I have bid for Vadhvan, and will bid for every stage of the project, but whether I win it or not depends on who else bids.

Q: Do you think it is policy preference?

A: No, I wouldn't say policy preference. But all I can tell you is no one will come and give to India what I can give. As an investor, we are different from anybody else. I will bring the world to India. And I will take India to the rest of the world. Nobody else is doing that.

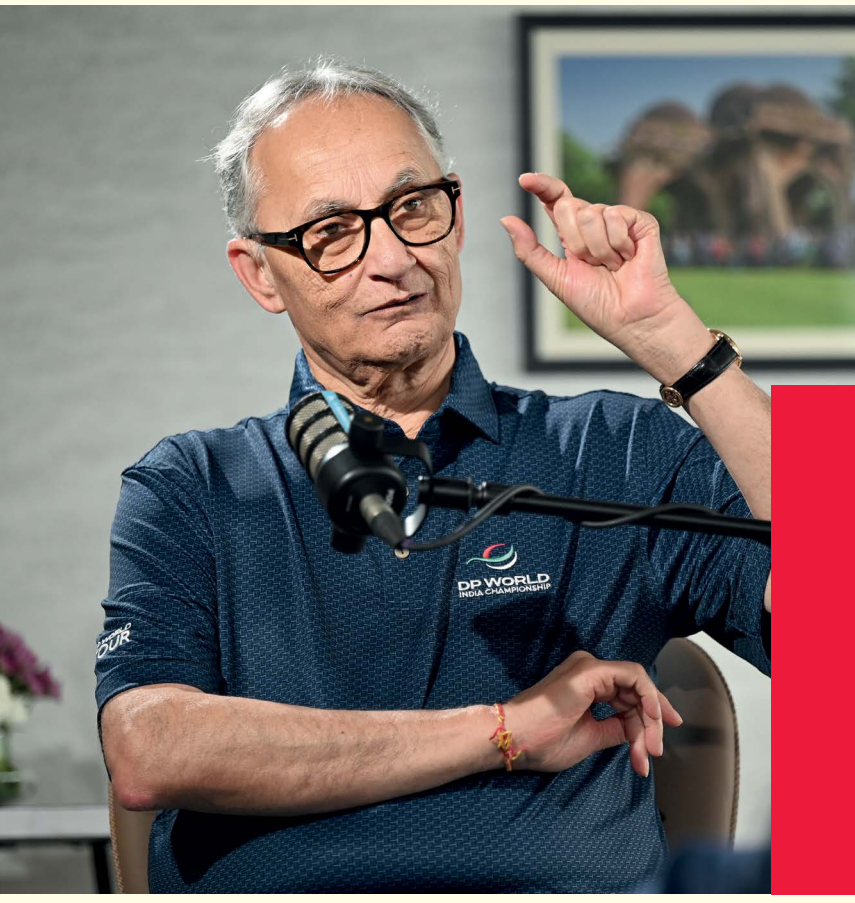

Q: Should a large, long-term committed foreign investor like your company be treated differently?

A: Listen, India must do what works best for India. I don't want any preferential treatment. If I can do 3x for India versus anybody else, should I not automatically be India's preference? How much money have I invested in India? How much money have I pulled out from India? And what am I prepared to do? I am selling India to the rest of the world.

Q: Have central and state-level processes for doing business in India improved? Has enough changed?

A: Has India progressed? Yes. Have good things happened? Yes. Digital India is phenomenal. Roads are being built on time, and railways infrastructure has improved. Has enough happened? No. Should we be doing things faster? Absolutely. Are we getting stuck up on processes? Absolutely.

Nobody is prepared to take a call. Everybody's constrained by process. We follow process. We are a government company and have massive empowerment. If we find something works, we just go—we are empowered to do it.

"When I meet a lot of successful industrialists I ask them, 'Why don't you create global institutions that have Indian origin"