Shreya Singh is the proud owner of Ferrari, Porsche, Lamborghini, and McLaren

THERE IS SOMETHING very appealing about the way Shreya Singh talks about fast cars. For the 24-year-old Mumbai entrepreneur who owns gyms, salons, and wellness centres, driving a supercar is not an occasional indulgence. It is how she unwinds, concentrates and, quite often, simply changes her mood.

"I get stressed, I go for a drive. I get angry, I go for a drive," she says.

Her weekday car is a Lamborghini Urus, chosen for the practical reason that an SUV is easier to drive on Mumbai roads. But her love affair with fast cars culminates over the weekends when she visits the family's farmhouse in Lonavala. This is where her Ferrari, Porsche, Lamborghini, and McLaren are parked. Among them, the Porsche GT3 RS is special. Singh first fell for the car during a track day at the Buddh International Circuit and eventually got one last year.

Singh talks enthusiastically about the naturally aspirated V10 of her Lamborghini Huracan, the acceleration of the Ferrari SF90 and the dramatic butterfly doors of the McLaren 720S. The latter, she says, makes her feel "like I'm a unicorn and I have wings".

She owns seven supercars and has an FMSCI, or Federation of Motor Sports Clubs of India, racing licence. For three consecutive years, she has been the fastest woman in the foreign-car category at The Valley Run (an annual drag-racing and motorsport festival, held at the Aamby Valley Airstrip near Lonavala), she says. She has driven through Austria and Germany, taken a Porsche GT3 RS on the Autobahn, and is planning an ice-driving experience in Norway.

For Sakshi Agarwal, 36, Founder and Chairperson of Path Foundation, (the CSR arm of Prakash Asphalting's & Toll Highways (India) Ltd), who lives in Mhow near Indore, the supercar is woven into a rather different routine. Her Ferrari 296 GT is frequently used for something unexpectedly domestic: taking her children out for an evening spin.

Agarwal began driving supercars in 2021 with a Lamborghini Urus and added the Ferrari in 2025. She drives between Mhow and Indore several times a week and also takes the Lamborghini to NATRAX, the National Automotive Test Tracks nearby. Inter-city Ferrari and Lamborghini drives provide another outlet.

"I'm not afraid of the speed and the control," she says. "It just gives me joy and the thrill."

What she enjoys most is not outright speed, but what she describes as the constant connection with the machine. She is equally comfortable on two wheels, riding a Harley and a Yamaha R15, and enjoys off-roading in a Jeep Rubicon or Range Rover.

Growing up, Agarwal dreamt of owning a red Mini Cooper and a red Ferrari. "Today I own both," she says with a smile.

That transition, from admiring such cars to independently driving them, is something Ritika Ahuja
