"The higher education system has largely remained unchanged for decades, but we believe it will be disrupted"

Q: Looking ahead, what will the next 25 years of ISB's journey be about?

A: If we think about it as a cricket match, the first innings was about proving that you could build a world-class institution in India. ISB demonstrated that with a relentless focus on excellence, student experience, an outward-looking curriculum, and strong connections with industry and policymakers, it can do so. The second innings asks: what will we do from India for the world?

The opportunity is not only to show that a world-class business school can exist in a developing economy. It is also to create knowledge from India that can help businesses operate in complex environments across the world.

India has experience in areas such as frugal innovation, public-private partnerships and digital platforms that offer lessons globally. The goal is to systematically study what is happening here and communicate those learnings to the world.
