report actively promoted and discussed by "Southern" multilateral and transnational caucuses such as the Group of 77 (G77) and G24.[109]

The Stiglitz Commission's report made concrete suggestions for greater participation of developing countries in international financial governance, and explicitly linked the issue arenas of global financial regulation (important to advanced industrial countries), development finance (critical for developing countries), food security (a major concern for India), environmentally sustainable development, and making financing available to developing countries for climate change mitigation. The commission's meetings also provided a forum for high-level, multilateral discussions on the historical anomaly of poor countries financing wealthy ones by sending their savings to be invested in low-yielding securities such as U.S. Treasury bonds and bills, thus effectively providing cheap loans to the U.S. government.

India was represented on the Stiglitz Commission by former Reserve Bank of India Governor V. K. Reddy, ensuring that its discussions would be widely followed there. In 2011, Stiglitz, along with the prominent London economist Nicholas Stern, circulated an informal paper laying out concrete suggestions for a southern-run multilateral bank.[110] That paper went through multiple revisions based on feedback from senior academics and policymakers worldwide, and subsequently was cited as a concrete inspiration for the NDB.[111] Senior Indian economic policymakers explicitly promoted the idea of a BRICS development bank among their BRICS colleagues, and Prime Minister Manmohan Singh formally proposed the idea at the New Delhi BRICS summit in 2012.

The BRICS Bank—Be Careful What You Wish For

By the 2013 Durban summit, the proposed new bank had a name—the NDB—and it opened for business in 2015 with a subscribed starting capital of $50 billion and authorized capital of $100 billion. It was joined by a second prospective multilateral institution, the CRA, with pledged funds totalling $100 billion.[112] Compared to the reserve holdings of some of the BRICS, not to mention China's other financial vehicles, these are not enormous sums. Moreover, the BRICS' shows of unity masked some important intra-BRICS disagreements, especially about the size of the bank. Both India and Brazil strongly insisted that initial capital subscriptions, and thus voting shares, be equally allocated among the five countries, and the others agreed except
