nationalists' point of view, the economic rise of China must come with a proportional increase in its power and prestige in the global economy. Contributions to international prestige may come from greater strength and wider use of the Chinese RMB (including its inclusion in the SDR) and a more genuine voice for China in global economic governance.[85]

Chinese monetary nationalism emphasizes the desirability of both protection of the country's financial and national security and a more active Chinese challenge to global economic governance. For the former, the Chinese government is tasked to maintain financial sovereignty against domestic and foreign attacks and international financial crises.[86] For the latter, pride in China's economic rise leads nationalists to demand that Chinese leaders take an increasingly active stance in challenging the existing global financial governance structure dominated by the United States and other incumbent powers.[87]With their rising pride in the country's economic success, it has become increasingly difficult domestically for Chinese leaders to maintain a low profile internationally.[88] All in all, the nationalists call for the Chinese leaders to act more aggressively in the global sphere, acting as the Great Power. In response, and to avoid such a nationalistic urge from going out of control, Xi's policy under the Chinese Dream is to guide China to take Great Power leadership in the global sphere by employing its globalizing RMB currency and its economic might.[89] Here, China's collaboration with the BRICS would allow it both to challenge the incumbent powers, particularly the United States, collectively and with higher legitimacy, and to soften the degree to which others perceive it as a threat.

Collaborating with the BRICS also goes well with popular nationalism because the Chinese people resent the meddling of the Western powers in Chinese affairs. China's "popular nationalism is particularly suspicious about a Western conspiracy and hidden agenda to slow down or even stop China's rise."[90] Hence, China's general public is even more vocal and emotional about Western domination in the international financial institutions and the perceived evil intentions of their policies toward China.

The globalizers and reformers in China, meanwhile, welcome this nationalistic push to make China a global financial power, seeing it as a useful counterweight to those powerful domestic interests that have blocked economic (particularly financial) reforms in the country for many years.