2003 or Libya in 2011. Indians have been especially annoyed that wealthy Western countries "play politics" and lag in paying their back dues to support the United Nations (UN) and other significant multilateral organizations.[189]

India's participation in the BRICS club builds on its decades-long activism within what is today termed the "global South," from Nehru's leadership of the Non-Aligned Movement (NAM) in the 1950s, to the UN negotiations in the 1980s around a more equitable New International Economic Order (NIEO), to the India-Brazil–South Africa (IBSA) Dialogue Forum, launched in 2003, which held its first leaders' summit in 2006. The IBSA website describes its members as "pluralistic, multicultural, and multiracial societies" and highlights common aspirations for "participatory democracy, respect for human rights, the Rule of Law, and the strengthening of multilateralism."[190] In practice, the IBSA countries have acted jointly to the greatest effect in the WTO, where their role plausibly has been referred to as spoilers of the grand bargain that major advanced industrial countries hoped for in the Doha Round.[191]

Today, Indian elites—in government, business, the press, the military, academia, and other areas—aspire to more than a reputation for consistently making the case for anticolonialism and redistribution on the global stage. India and Russia also have a long relationship, going back to the days of the Soviet Union. Russia continues to be a major supplier of conventional arms to India, while recent India-China tensions make enhanced energy and diplomatic ties with Russia increasingly attractive within India.[192] The BRICS club appeals to India because—unlike the NAM, NIEO, or even IBSA—the BRICS club unites global revisionism with actual power resources, both military and financial, possibly to the extent that would make an impact on international outcomes.[193] Some geopolitical and strategic analysts also view the strengthening of intra-BRICS financial links as enhancing India's overall autonomy in international relations.[194]

Uniting to Project India's Voice into Global Governance

Indian policymakers hold accumulated knowledge and expertise in financial governance. They can magnify their potential influence if India bands together with the other BRICS countries to enlarge its impact on global economic management. Indian policy elites long have aspired to a larger
