promoting Mumbai as an international financial center. The report, predictably positive, recommended promoting Mumbai as a regional financial hub for West, South, and Southeast Asia, drawing on Indian capital markets expertise and tapping diaspora savings.[201] In January 2008, another expert committee, chaired by former IMF chief economist Raghuram Rajan—then a professor in the United States, and thus a somewhat controversial figure to head a government-appointed body—recommended further liberalizing reforms of domestic finance, with one eye turned to the requirements for achieving a larger global profile.[202] More recently, India's private financial community has become excited about the BRICS' financial cooperation. Akshay Mathur, head of research at the Mumbai-based think tank Gateway House, which has strong ties to the private financial sector, presented a paper at the 2015 BRICS academic conference that highlighted increasing intra-BRICS local currency–denominated trade and proposed a BRICS currency clearinghouse, a reinsurance market for global shipping, and a credit-rating agency—and also noted that Mumbai would be ideally suited to host any of these new institutions.[203] Mathur further advocated moving away from global oil-pricing in U.S. dollars.

Less apparent from outside India is the degree of contemporary convergence among representatives of normally contending economic schools of thought within India on the desirability of playing a larger role in global financial institutions and governance. Former RBI Governor Reddy, for example, has been a leader among those economists generally in favor of a more statist and inward-focused style of national financial regulation, while Prasad and Rajan (the latter appointed by Singh as RBI governor in mid-2013) are market liberalizers. Governor Rajan highlighted the urgent need for the Bretton Woods' twins to become more inclusive, observing, "Legitimacy is important . . . Legitimacy is not just about quota, not just about who appoints the boss of the organisation, it's about sharing agendas, it's about transparency on the issues that come to the table, about giving everybody a chance to place those issues."[204]

India thus has ideas about how and why to reform global finance and its governance—but, acting alone, it lacks the money or the influence to implement them. India, considering itself the source of the NDB idea (and, sotto voce, better qualified to run the BRICS bank than either China or
