(FDI) in infrastructure, reportedly leading Indian officials to anticipate up to $100 billion in inward FDI promises from Xi when he visited later that year. Instead, at the Modi-Xi New Delhi summit in September 2014, Xi disappointed, pledging only $20 billion in Chinese FDI for railways and other infrastructure.[225] Worse, during the summit itself, Chinese troops entered disputed Himalayan territory controlled by India, supposedly accidentally, a coincidence widely interpreted in India as intentionally timed to send a warning to India to cooperate with Chinese initiatives.[226]

Moreover, under Modi's more muscular foreign policy, India has attempted harder bargaining within the BRICS club. Modi reportedly tried to revisit the NDB-siting decision, and he had to be reminded that his predecessor had already agreed to the bank being headquartered in Shanghai.[227] One commentator suggested that Modi's resistance melted only when the Chinese offered a quid pro quo: if Modi accepted the NDB deal, China would drop its long-standing objection to India becoming a full member of the SCO. Of course, rival Pakistan also would be offered full SCO membership, but Modi's government judged that India had come out ahead.[228]

In sum, India's apparent cheerleading, at least in the joint BRICS Summit declarations, for China to rapidly elbow aside the United States in global financial markets is, in the end, more diplomatic than heartfelt. While it is true that few Indian political or policy elites would like to see China displace or become a serious rival to the United States (or the West more generally) at the apex of the international financial system, India would like to see global financial capabilities become more evenly distributed. For the moment, nonetheless, Indian policymakers see only benefits from cooperating with China and the other BRICS to reduce Western hubris without supporting China becoming a coequal power with the West.

THE VIEW FROM BRASÍLIA: ENHANCING STATUS AND INVITING INVESTMENT

Brazil's interactions with the BRICS club through this writing occurred mostly during a 13-and-a-half-year period when the center-left administrations of two-term presidents Luiz Inácio "Lula" da Silva (January 2003–December 2010) and Dilma Rousseff (January 2011–May 2016), both from the Workers' Party (PT), governed the country. Three themes are most significant in Brazilian motivations. First, Brazil has previously
