aware of their country's continuing vulnerability to international "market sentiment," and thus eager to participate in any scheme credibly promising greater input for emerging economies in global monetary and financial governance. More recently, many Brazilian policy and business elites have been horrified by the ability of an activist U.S. District Court judge based in New York City to impose third-party financial sanctions on any U.S. banks choosing to do business with Argentina, so long as any private bondholders have outstanding suits against Argentina in the U.S. courts.[232]

Brazil has sought to increase its participation in global financial policy debates. During the da Silva and Rousseff presidencies, Brazil became well known in Washington for left-leaning economist Paulo Nogueira Batista (PNB), its outspoken ED at the IMF, representing Brazil and eleven other Latin American and Lusophone developing countries. PNB developed a devoted following on YouTube, during and after the global financial crisis, giving many well-reasoned yet provocative interviews in English, Spanish, and Portuguese. He became very popular with left-leaning politicians and intellectuals throughout Latin America, as well as with Russian and Middle East English-language media outlets. Batista occasionally exceeded instructions, for example, in mid-2013 refusing to vote in favor of the latest IMF bailout package for Greece, claiming that it was excessively punitive and dysfunctional.[233] PNB was recalled to Brasília and told by Finance Minister Mantega to support the loan package, which he then did—but he was not replaced at the IMF.

Brazil also played a role as gadfly when PNB, and the Brazilian delegations to the World Bank and IMF, were asked by the Group of 24 (G24), a longtime grouping of developing-country financial officials and experts meeting informally but consistently in Washington, DC, to coordinate the campaign of former Colombian Finance Minister José Antonio Ocampo for the presidency of the World Bank in 2011 (see Chapter 3). In 2015, when the position of Brazilian Vice President for the NDB opened, the nod went to PNB.

Another prominent Brazilian economist is Otaviano Canuto, a World Bank vice president (2009–2013) and then senior specialist on the BRICS (2013–2015), and Batista's replacement as Brazil's ED at the IMF. Canuto has written multiple technical papers and blogs around themes central to the NDB discussions, for example urging Southern countries to invest their excess foreign exchange in one another rather than in low-yielding U.S.
