become a source of concern, although the lack of good alternatives contributes to its persistent dominance.[70]

Third, the rising powers may become increasingly dissatisfied with the burden of having to succeed under the incumbents' rules. As Randall Schweller and David Priess argue, the dominant "dissatisfied power believes it is outperforming its competitors despite the shackles . . . placed on it," and that it would rise even faster under its own rules.[71] In the BRICS case, the incumbents' rules have largely tolerated the BRICS countries' varieties of capitalism, including in their state-directed and crony capitalist forms, despite the negative consequences for the advanced economies. However, if the Trump administration (2017–) pursues extreme economic nationalist positions on currency adjustments and trade protectionism, the BRICS, particularly China, may reconsider their position on tolerating the existing "shackles."

All three factors encourage China and the BRICS to attempt to delegitimize American preponderance—but without undermining the incumbent order—while the group increases its bargaining power and China prepares a new foundation of parallel governance arrangements.[72] As explored throughout this book, rising powers are pursuing "rise from within" strategies and "inside reforms" of the IMF and other global governance organizations, while simultaneously pursuing "outside options" by building parallel institutions. Neither China and Russia—the most likely hard-core revisionist members of the BRICS—nor any of the other BRIC members has adopted a strategy of revolutionary overthrow as spoilers or full-blown shirking in international economic and financial institutions.[73] The BRICS countries are motivated to adopt a dual strategy in financial statecraft because they remain dissatisfied with progress in the first track, ambitious to achieve the influence that they believe is commensurate with their rising international positions, and concerned about their vulnerabilities to U.S. and Western institutional and market failures, as well as the deliberate use by the West of coercion in financial and economic statecraft. But how can the BRICS mobilize and best employ their potential bargaining power to advance their interests?
