Typology of BRICS Club Policies

Functions	Instruments
	Formal rules and institutional properties	Informal practices
Enhance bargaining power	Increase members' presence in existing institutions (e.g., IMF, World Bank, G20).	Challenge the legitimacy of incumbent powers' clubs (e.g., G7).
Enhance status	Create a club with nonrivalrous, but excludable, membership.	Protect the BRICS "brand" as heterogeneous and representative.
Promote group interests	Create parallel institutions. Share leadership positions.	Bind China and take advantage of its rise.

Table 1.1 provides a typology of the various ways in which the BRICS behave as a multilateral club, bringing together the arguments of this chapter. The initial column lists the functions, or goals, of cooperation from the viewpoint of the participating countries. The remaining columns clarify the ways in which the member countries may pursue these functions by means of formal rules and institutional incentives (column two) or via informal practices (column three). The first row lists the BRICS' collective goal of enhancing their international bargaining power vis-à-vis the incumbent powers, which may be pursued through both formal mechanisms to increase their presence and voice in existing international organizations such as the IMF, or by means of informal yet widely publicized complaints that question the legitimacy of the long dominance of the G7 in global economic governance. Row two notes that the BRICS may boost their global status by both the formal, concrete action of creating their own exclusive coordinating club (the BRICS group itself), and by informally marketing that club as having desirable qualities such as heterogeneity and representativeness—qualities arguably lacking within the G7. Row three
