The second or vertical dimension in the table demarcates two types of venues for collective financial statecraft, which may focus on either international "institutions" or global "markets." Both institutions and markets may be subject to attempts by states employing financial statecraft to execute either inside reforms or outside options.

FOUR CATEGORIES OF COLLECTIVE FINANCIAL STATECRAFT

As Chapter 2 shows, the major emerging powers in recent years, prominently including the BRICS, have risen quickly in their relative financial and monetary capabilities, becoming significant new players in the postwar global economic order established by incumbent major powers. Because the postwar liberal economic order reflects the preferences and voices of those incumbent powers, policymakers in these rising powers hope to see their own capabilities and preferences better reflected in the prevailing global order by challenging its important aspects.

Collective international action, principally through the club mechanisms discussed in Chapter 1, has been one means of pursuing the overlapping goals of the individual BRICS states. BRICS governments discovered focal points for their common interests during transgovernmental meetings of senior officials from the BRICS countries. BRICS collaboration has included ministers and deputy ministers of foreign affairs, finance, economy, and other government departments unrelated to financial and economic matters, as well as the sherpas and sous-sherpas. Together, they coordinated common positions on a range of issues concerning the four cases recounted in this chapter. The evidence of their collaboration is found in ten years of joint communiqués and other public statements by leaders and officials, as well as interviews of officials conducted by scholars. During Russia's chairmanship of BRICS in 2015–2016, for example, over ten ministerial and about twenty expert meetings and other events were scheduled. At the 7th BRICS Heads of State Summit in Ufa, Russia, the official declaration included seventy-seven summit items.[7] Under the 2016 Indian sponsorship of the BRICS Summit in Goa, there were ninety-five events, and the Goa declaration boasted 110 agenda items for the 8th BRICS Heads of State Summit.

When the BRICS reached common or overlapping positions, they seized the opportunity to bargain with their American and G7 counterparts. These encounters were usually on the sidelines of the meetings of multilateral organizations or in the G20 setting after that group was elevated to become
