a 100 percent multilateral capital increase as part of the 2010 IMF package, which also included a 3.3 percent quota reallocation away from the advanced industrial countries and toward developing countries in the World Bank, and a 6 percent readjustment between roughly the same groups in the IMF. China, Brazil, Mexico, India, and other large emerging economies benefited the most.

The 2008 Quota and Voice Reforms were finally implemented in 2011, resulting in an ad hoc (one time only) shift of shares, with increases for 54 countries, including in the top percentage China, India, and Brazil among the BRICS and South Korea, Japan, and the United States among the developed countries. The top losers in percentage terms included the United Kingdom, France, Saudi Arabia, Canada, Russia, Netherlands, and Belgium. As shown in Figure 3.4, of BRICS countries' quota shares over time, South Africa has lost in every IMF reform since the Singapore agreement, decreasing 21 percent (from 0.8670 to 0.634). Russia declined from 2.734 to 2.386, but then increased 8 percent in the 2010 package to rise to 2.587.[23]
