For years, jewellery trends were outlined in the design language of ornamentation—bigger diamonds, rarer stones, heavier settings, more sparkle. But the conversation is changing. Today, jewellery is becoming far more personal. Women are no longer looking just for pieces that match an outfit or mark an occasion. They are looking for jewels that carry meaning, memory, emotion and identity.

As a designer, I find this shift deeply exciting because it allows jewellery to move beyond decoration. It becomes a language. A flower can speak of becoming. A bird can represent freedom. A lock can hold a secret. A gemstone can carry a feeling. The most relevant jewellery today is not just beautiful; it says something.

Nature, but Reimagined

Nature has always been one of the most enduring inspirations in jewellery, but today it is being interpreted with far more imagination. Florals are no longer just delicate and pretty. Birds are not merely decorative. Leaves, wings, petals and organic forms are being treated almost like sculpture.

The new nature-inspired jewel is lush, expressive and full of personality. It celebrates the natural world, but not in a literal way. It takes inspiration from flowers, birds, insects and movement, then transforms them into something more fantastical and emotional. This is a trend I connect with deeply because nature has always carried symbolism. It speaks of renewal, freedom, femininity, growth and resilience. When translated into fine jewellery, it allows a woman to wear not just beauty, but a feeling.

Colour as Character

Colour is having a powerful moment; breaking the hegemony of diamonds that have dominated the idea of luxury. Today, coloured gemstones are bringing back individuality, joy and emotional depth. Rubies, emeralds, sapphires, turquoise, opals, pearls, mother-of-pearl, chrysoprase and other gemstones are no longer being used only as accents. They are becoming the heart of the jewel. Colour lends a piece its mood. It can make jewellery feel passionate, spiritual, playful, regal, mysterious or quietly elegant.

What I love about colour is that it is never neutral. It says something about the woman who chooses it. It allows her to express her instinct, her energy and her individuality. In that sense, coloured gemstone jewellery is not just a trend —it is a form of self-expression.

The Rise of the Modern Talisman

One of the most meaningful shifts in jewellery today is the return of symbolism. Women are increasingly drawn to jewels that feel like personal talismans—pieces that carry love, luck, protection, hope, strength or memory.

This is why motifs are becoming so important again. A lock, a key, a heart, a bird, a flower, an eye, a medallion, a monogram — each can hold a private meaning. The beauty of symbolic jewellery is that it works on two levels. To the world, it may appear decorative; to the wearer, it may define an entire story.

Clockwise from far left: Elephant Majesty Cuff features handpicked Zambian emerald beads; Emerald Canopy Ring; Earrings from the Zarine Collection

