

HERITAGE REFRAMED

These aren't cabinets, they're miniature façadesthat capture history. For instance, each limited edition piece channels Mumbai's Art Deco legacy: the geometric window grills of Prakash Manzil, stacked balconies of Rajjab Mahal and Liberty Cinema's sweeping curves and vertical bands. What defined those buildings—repetition, symmetry, and bold linear forms—lives and breathes in these bars from the Portside Cafe Furniture Studio in leather, wood, and brass.

The geometry is rigid but leather breathes while wood grounds it. Handcrafted exteriors in printed and distressed leather carry intricate Deco patterns with material warmth. Inside, the mood shifts: bright quilted ultra suede, brass railings echoing old cinema halls and their faded glamour. Open a door and you're not just reaching for a bottle, but stepping into heritage.

The palette draws from classic Deco luxury: warm ochres against deep blues and muted teals with metallic accents; it's architecture you can pour a drink from.

"Bombay always finds its way into my work. It's the city that taught me to see from the rounded corners of Shiv Shakti Bhavan at Oval Maidan to the quiet geometry that stays with you. I didn't want just another cabinet. I wanted to capture Bombay evenings: lived-in elegance, something nostalgic yet breathing. These bars hold on to one of the city's greatest legacies," says Bobby Aggarwal, founder and designer, Portside Cafe Furniture Studio. These bars are just that; layered and a little indulgent, like dwelling inside history. And it shows up in the details.
